Excerpt: . . . This would support the assertion that time within a team is an important influence on collective efficacy beliefs. Collective efficacy is a group level dynamic, however, it is possible that individual level variables can shape or influence the development of this team construct. One potential individual level variable examined was experience. Because more military experience might indicate a better initial understanding of how SFOR works, and less apparent chaos to a newcomer ( Saks, 1995 ), we expected more experience ( as indicated by rank and by previous NATO work ) to be positively associated with collective efficacy. Overview of the current research The environment in which data was collected was the SFOR HQ. This HQ is an international, professional military climate. The work to be accomplished is staff work such as planning, coordinating, monitoring, and decision-making. There are NATO ( Belgium, Canada, Czech Republic, Denmark, France, Germany, Greece, Hungary,...
